STELLA'S CHARCOAL DRAWINGS HIS BEST

Post-Impressionist Shows His Work at Italian National Club.

FACILE, HE LACKS DEPTH

Has Not Developed a Personal Voice, but Is Lively and Human.

Joseph Stella, whose paintings, drawngs and silver points have just been placed on view for a month at the Italian National Club in East Fortyfourth street, is wholly an artist, yet two-fifths a doctor also. It seems that family pressure and the logic of events kept him in line as a student for two years of the required five at one of the medical schools in this city, with the ex-pectation of following the example of an older brother, who is active here in medical and philanthropic work. But at this point in his career the young man revolted and turned from medicine a series of strata, as it were, in the development of an obviously eager talent. At first you come upon paintings and drawings made with the meticulous care that marks the student, mindful of what he sees before him and bent upon literal statement. Every line and wrinkle of the faces of his models, every idiosyncrasy of bone and skin, has been observed. One thinks of those painstaking Germans of the Menzel following, who drew and spared not, until what they had thought or felt about their subjects was lost under the weight of burdensome detail.

Next, and this serves to emphasize anew how hard it is for a contemporary Italian either to forget the great traditions of his country's art or to be really individual without being at the the same time eccentric, Mr. Stella produced pictures in which the idiom of of the old masters has controlled. They are done with ability, but it is hopeless for the artist of to-day to trespass upon this ground; the last words were said in this vein three centuries and more

It was in Pitisburg, in 1908, that Stella gave convincing demonstration of his possibilities. One of the philanthropic societies was about to make an investigation of conditions in the steel mills of the Smoky City. It was arranged that young Stella should act in the capacity of an investigator, and while he was about this business he managed to make a sheaf of drawings in charcoal, portraying workers of various nationalities in their real aspects at their tasks. They obtained wide circulation and were published in Charities War Courier as Young Wife and other magazines as authentic documents that at the same time were of artistic value.
